Obviously, one of the best w	vays to prevent the spread or	f COVID-19 is to wash your hands, and this may seem like common (33)	to many people. (34)	, it wasn't until the mid-19th century that some doctors in the United State	es and Europe began to was	h their hands before examining patients and even then, only in certain cases.

The importance of hand washing for medical professionals didn't really become understood until scientists hit upon germ theory – the idea that unlike (35) _____, certain diseases and infections are caused by microorganisms we can't observe with the (36) _____ eye. In particular, the British surgeon Joseph Lister drastically improved patient mortality by advocating that surgeons wash their hands and sterilize their instruments.

Today, medical and h	ealth professionals co	onsider hand washing a	critical hygienic practice, both for themselves and their patie	ents. There are even	guidelines, (37)	are often issued by healthcare organizations and agencies, f	or how to properly w	ash your hands.

When travellers get off the train at Yamato City, a commuter suburb about 30km from Tokyo, their eyes might be drawn to a few white cloth signs fluttering in the station forecourt. These signs are the only visible indication of a policy that attracted global attention: a ban on pedestrians using their phones while walking Japanese streets are full of arukisumaho, a widely used term describing slow, bowing pedestrians who are glued to their smartphone screens. "It is simply dangerous," says Mayor Satoru Ohki, the leading figure behind the policy. Ohki initially floated the idea with local lawmakers and, after running a public consultation, found that eight out of 10 people supported it. As a result, a ban on using smartphones while walking was put into effect in June.

It's not the first time a country has taken measures to prevent injuries related to smartphone walkers. Ilsan, a city in South Korea, installed flickering lights and laser beams at road crossings to alert phone-scrolling pedestrians, while authorities in the Chinese city of Chongqing opened a 30m "cell phone lane" on pathways for pedestrians busy on their phones. And countries in the West are also taking steps; in Hawaii, a "Distracted Walking Law" means you can be fined for texting while walking in a crosswalk.

It's also clear that Japanese citizens are well aware of the danger to themselves and others of smartphone use while walking. In a 2019 survey of 562 smartphone users in Japan, 96.6% of respondents said they were aware of the dangers, 13.2% had experienced collisions first-hand while 9.5% said they'd been injured as a result of arukisumaho. "I strongly agree with the law," says Tokyo native Atsuko Nabata, who is in her 60s and regularly commutes through central Tokyo via bike. "When I'm cycling I have to avoid people who are looking at their phones, I've even been hit before," she says.

But one important thing to note is that this ban has no concrete penalty, so can it really make an impact? Naota Suzuki, a lawyer in Shibuya, points out that "there are laws that do not have punishments but are effective". He says whether these unenforced laws are successful is rooted in the Japanese concept of meiwaku, which can be translated as "being a nuisance to other people". For example, there is an unwritten rule that using your phone on public transport is something that you should never do. So, even though it is not technically prohibited by any laws, people still refrain from doing so. In Yamato, Mayor Ohki hopes that the ban will help residents perceive the 'smartphone walking' behaviour as meiwaku, and adjust their actions according to an evolving social norm.

Question 43: Which best serves as the title for the passage?

- A. The Japanese City That Banned "Smartphone Walking"
- B. What Do Japanese People Think About A Smartphone Ban
- C. How Cities Are Preventing Smartphone-Related Injuries
- D. A Smartphone Ban With No Penalties: Will It Be Effective?

Question 45: Which of the following is a measure implemented to prevent injuries related to smartphone walking, according to passage 3?

- A. a complete ban on the use of smartphones on the street.
- B. the use of laser beams to detect phone-scrolling pedestrians.
- C. the construction of a specific lane for pedestrians using phones.
- D. a law that requires people to pay a fine to use phones in a crosswalk.

Question 46: The 2019 survey mentioned in paragraph 4 found that
A. most respondents do not know they are endangering others by using smartphones when they walk
B. almost all respondents are fully aware of the dangers of smartphone use while walking
C. a total of 22.7% of respondents have had severe collisions resulting from arukisumaho
D. more than one-tenth of the respondents were injured in accidents related to smartphone walking
Question 47: The word "concrete" in paragraph 3 can be best replaced by
A. forceful B. definite C. accurate D. intense Question 48: The word "it" in paragraph 4 refers to
A. the concept of meiwaku
B. an unwritten rule
C. being a nuisance to other people
D. using phone on public transport
Question 49: Which of the following is NOT TRUE, according to the passage?
A. In South Korea, technology was utilized to reduce injuries related to smartphone walking,
B. Over 90% of people in Yamato approved of prohibiting pedestrians from using smartphones.
C. In Japan, there are unwritten rules that people follow because they do want to be nuisance to other people.
D. Mayor Ohki hopes Yamato residents will consider smartphone walking meiwaku and change their behaviour.
Question 50: Which of the following can be inferred from the passage?
A. Countries around the world have praised Yamato City's ban on smartphone walkers.
B. Some people did not support Mayor Ohki's idea as they wanted a ban with penalties.
C. Atsuko Nabata has never had accidents again since the smartphone walking ban was imposed.
D. If the concept of meiwaku did not exist, some laws without penalty would not be very effective.
