Read the following passage and mark the letter A, B, C, or D on your answer sheet to indicate the correct answer to each of the questions from 34 to 38.

Because of their unique experiences growing up, different generations may have differing perspectives on relationships and break-ups. Divorce rates among Generation X have risen, and many crave both security and personal fulfillment. They could be more inclined to end toxic relationships. Millennials place a premium on compatibility and personal development. They value their personal pleasure and well-being over being in unsatisfying relationships since they grew up during rapid social changes brought about by technology.

Gen Z is the first generation to have grown up completely immersed in the digital environment. They have non-traditional ideas on dating and relationships and are at ease with concepts such as casual dating and open relationships. Break-ups are viewed as a regular aspect of dating by Generation Z, rather than failures. They have a more fluid approach to relationships and may not value lifelong monogamy as much as previous generations.

Individual outlooks, however, differ dramatically within each cohort. Views are also influenced by cultural background and personal situations. While generations share general trends defined by their eras, each person's relationship ideas are unique to their experiences and ideals. For example, despite societal liberties, some millennials value commitment, just as some Gen Xers value non-traditional institutions.

Finally, each individual navigates relationships differently. Personal reasons, rather than generational trends, influence how they deal with endings. While growing up in different eras established some relational predispositions for each cohort, other factors ensure that perspectives remain vary between and within age groups. The present broad spectrum of lives and perspectives on partnerships reflects the intricate interplay that has occurred over time between societal development, technology, and individuality.

Cities worldwide will continue to experience significant population expansion in the next decades. Already, more than half of the world's population lives in cities, and by 2050, that figure is expected to rise to 6.5 billion, or around 70% of the global population. This growth will pose significant problems to municipal planning and development.

As more people cram into limited spaces, problems such as traffic congestion, pollution, noise, and a lack of housing will worsen if communities do not adequately prepare. Cities will need to find methods to create many more homes, hospitals, schools, offices, and other amenities to handle the rising population. They will also need to provide adequate resources such as fresh water, electricity, public transit, sanitation, and waste management for billions of additional citizens.

With so many people living in dense urban areas, finding enough acreage to grow food within city limits will be tough. Some cities are already experimenting with novel solutions, such as vertical farms, which stack growing areas atop each other in towering structures to conserve horizontal space. Growing plants on rooftops and abandoned areas is another common approach.

Many urban areas are taking proactive initiatives to plan for future sustainable communities. Expansion of bike-sharing and electric car networks for greener mobility, such as in Bristol, England, are two examples. Singapore's vertical farms make use of modern greenhouse technology. Amsterdam is constructing floating homes on the river to house additional citizens without taking up valuable land.

While it is hard to forecast every future invention, it is certain that cities around the world will need to implement smart, environmentally friendly designs and laws in order to deal with the massive population inflow in an equitable manner. Greener building, renewable energy sources, efficient public transportation networks, and utilizing available vertical and horizontal space will all likely play major roles in shaping tomorrow's livable, resilient cities.
